Blast Damages Belfast Factory

BELFAST (Reuter) — This Northern Ireland capital was shaken early today by a heavy explosion which badly damaged a factory in the city. The blast could be heard more than 10 miles away. There were no immediate reports of injuries.

The U.S. Coast Guard released four Cuban fishing boat captains and their vessels to Cuban authorities in international waters Tuesday night as part of an exchange being negotiated for four Americans held in Cuba.

The state department and the coast guard would not comment on plans for an exchange. However, federal order for reduction of the six-month terms of the Cubans, convicted of fishing illegally in U.S. waters May 25.

Reliable sources said the exchange would involve Dr. Bernard Bender, a Long Beach, Calif., dentist wanted by the FBI: his two sons, and a friend, who were aboard the 58-foot yacht White Cloud, held in Cuba.

Key Man Advised To Sit Out Hearings

A member of the B. C. Pollution Control Board explained this week that he did not sit as a member at a hearing of the board last week on an appeal by Dison Development Ltd. on advice of the provincial attorney-general's department.

Dr. J. A. Taylor, deputy provincial health minister, said the attorney-general's officials had told him it was their opinion that he should not sit at the hearing because a member of his department would be making a presentation objecting to granting of the appeal.

This was their opinion, he said, because they thought that if he did sit, the board's decision could later have been challenged on the basis that one of its members was biased.

Taylor said it was the first PCB hearing from which he had been absent on that basis. However, it was also the first PCB hearing at which the health department presented an objection.

Earlier Tuesday, Valter Raudsepp, who is deputy minister of water resources and sits as chairman of the PCB, said through a spokesman the board does not have a policy of preventing members from sitting at hearings because of involvements of their departments.

"No one instructed Dr. Taylor not to show up," Raudsepp said through PCB information officer James McCrossan. "He just did not appear. The board itself has no such policy."

Dison had launched its appeal after William Venables, director of pollution control, had turned down its application for a permit that would allow it to discharge up to one million gallons per day of mining effluent into the Juan de Fuca Strait near Jordan River.

McCrossan officially confirmed Tuesday the board has upheld the appeal and instructed Venables to issue a permit to Dison "subject to such considerations that he personally judges necessary."

By the Pollution Control Act under which he operates, Venables already had the authority to issue the permit subject to any conditions he wished at the time he chose to reject the application.

The board's decision, however, means that instead of checking a definite application and possibly making suggestions for changes, employees of the pollution control branch now will have to conduct studies and decide what should be allowed to be discharged and at what location.

McCrossan said it would not be possible to determine how many man-hours would have to be spent working on the problem, although he did say earlier the permit would probably not be issued before the end of the month, because "obviously a great deal of study has to go into it."

As the staff consists of provincial government employees, their salaries will be paid by the branch and not by Dison, he said, saying this was because they would be making their recommendations to Venables rather than to the company.

In reply to a question, he said he did not think the decision was establishing a precedent that would encourage persons making applications to submit them in general form in the knowledge that the branch would save them money by performing the studies needed for definite information.

As an example of why this would not happen, McCrossan pointed out the application form requires a description of proposed effluent characteristics.

In the Dison application, however, a content of five parts per million of copper had been requested, although the approved figure will likely not exceed .05 ppm, which is quite different from that stated on the application.

The board's ruling, he said, included provision for a monitoring program.

"It is an example of a government attempt at a middle-of-the-road compromise between the need to provide employment for an increasing population and the need to protect the environment," McCrossan said.

The company's application for waste disposal from the Sunro Mine was opposed by nine individual objectors, some of whom represented groups, and the recreation and conservation and health departments.

The health department had contended that heavy metals contained in the effluent could pose a potential hazard to human health because of their tendency to accumulate in the food chain.

Shear Audacity

SINGAPORE (Reuter) — When pretty Lee Choy Leng boarded a crowded city bus Monday, she had long black hair hanging down to her waist. When she got off, she discovered about half of it had been shorn by an enterprising thief with an eye on the lucrative market for human hair among local wigmakers.

Italy's Strikes Affect Tourists

ROME (Reuter) — Hundreds of foreign tourists cut short vacations in Rome Tuesday as a six-day-old strike by the city's hotel employees continued. Genoa, Italy's largest port, was semi-paralysed by a 24-hour strike of dock workers which prevented the departure of 14 ships, including the luxury transatlantic liner Michelangelo.
